Mentor-protégé plays are not new. Think of Donald Margulies' perceptive drama "Collected Stories"—in which a well-respected teacher-short story writer comes into conflict with her student-author. A very different kind of conflict

Owner of South End lodging house: shocked to hear guests are disrupting the block

COURTESY ADAM GAFFIN

After listening to numerous residents of the South End's Concord Square neighborhood complain about drug dealing, people on the front steps passed out on the front steps or angrily shouting at nearby residents, broken glass and cigarette butts tossed into neighboring yards, the CEO of the company that now owns the 16-room lodging house at 44 Concord Sq. declared himself stunned - and vowed to get to the bottom of it all.

"I don't like having people who are angry at us who feel that we've wronged them," Bruce Percelay of the Mount Vernon Co. in Allston said on September 28 at a Boston Licensing Board meeting on Zoom, which the board called to air complaints from the square's more permanent residents.

Percelay added, though, he wishes residents had contacted him or his company first before going to the licensing board with "an avalanche of complaints that I certainly literally knew nothing about."

"We're as transparent and as open a book as there is here in this business," he said. "Where there's smoke there's fire, I suppose. ... We want to solve this, we want to be a good neighbor."

Condos could replace restaurant row

WWW.UNIVERSALHUB.COM

A developer has filed plans to replace three restaurants at 1395-1405 Washington Street in the South End with a $23 million, seven-story condo building.

Two of the restaurants—the Gallows and Black Jack Pasta Kitchen—are already closed for good.

Developer Peter Georgantas says the new building, which will also include ground-floor retail space, "will fill in the huge gap that currently exists within the Washington Street corridor along this block by replacing what is currently a non-descript, anomalous, single story retail buildings flanked by existing (6) and (7) story residential buildings to the east and west."

Five of the units would be sold as affordable. The building would have no on-site parking.

Deborah Zoe Laufer is clearly fond of eccentrics. In the playwrights' dramedy "The Last Scharitz"—affectingly staged a while back by Gloucester Stage Company, middle sibling

Simon sees his love of astronomy as a kind of launch pad for astronaut-based adventurousness. Laufer's intriguing 90-minute play "Be Here Now" gives sympathetic hearings to the very different drummers' beats of nihilist doctoral candidate Bari and garbage architectural wizard Mike.

Sound

characterizes Adam Rapp's Tony-nominated two-character play "The Sound Inside" (2018 at Williamstown, 2019 on Broadway).

Here a professor-novelist and short story writer faces the challenges that evolve as she meets with an unusual student who has begun writing a short novel of his own. Those meetings become a trenchantly tense drama now in a SpeakEasy Stage Hub premiere powerfully directed by Bryn Boice.

The teacher and student in question are a strong study in contrast. Bella Baird, a 53 year old single creative writing professor at a New Haven Ivy League school (Yale of course), lives in simple school quarters—kudos to Cristina Todesco for a fittingly austere gray and black scenic design.

Spirited and iconoclastic, the Illinois native thinks of French literary giant Honore de Balzac as she describes God as "a fat man with money who can still get it up" and describes herself as a hoarder of first editions of the works of Edith Wharton and Samuel Beckett. Unpretentious Baird speaks of her own novel "struggling to stay in print" and admits (to the audience who could be her class) that she published it about 20 years earlier.

Christopher Dunn, who could hail from the Victorian era, prefers penmanship to computer writing, hates Tweets and chooses to make unannounced visits to his teacher rather than schedule appointments.

Even so, the Vermont student likes her "Reading Fiction for Craft" class and has even read her novel and two volumes of short stories. Ambitiously he wants to include a scene inspired by Dostoevsky in his own work. Not surprisingly, Dunn is putting his novel on a Corona typewriter.

While Rapp's characters are very well delineated (as in his earlier stunningly harrowing two-person drama "Blackbird,") the twists and surprises in their relationship should make audiences give "The Sound Inside" a fully absorbed hearing. Adding substantially to that undivided attention are the 'scenes' from Dunn's own work in progress—a kind of novel-within-the-play.

Rapp's talent for crisp dialogue in the exchanges between teacher and student is matched by his deft development of the New York City meeting of student Billy and seemingly penniless yet mysterious stranger Shane in the student's novel ('novella' as Baird terms it).

Ultimately, the fortunes of Baird and Dunn prove as riveting as those of Billy and Shane. What will happen to the professor, who suffers from what she openly describes as a "constellation of advanced cancer tumors"?

How will the student's studies and writing fare? Also, what will come of Baird's special request to Dunn? Rapp makes the answers both compelling and haunting.

Jennifer Rohn and Nathan Malin prove as compelling as Rapp's fine play. Rohn has all of Baird's feistiness and subtlety. Her opening expository speech establishes both the professor's wit and her mysterious innervoice. Malin captures Dunn's engaging elusiveness and his intrepid individuality.

Boice gives full voice to the loneliness and warring urges in both Baird and Dunn. For its part, SpeakEasy Stage has built up the kind of theater cred that brought Rapp's strong play to the Hub even as the Tony Awards approached.

Next spring this standout company will stage the actual 2021 Tony Award winner "The Inheritance" (a gay epic treatment of "Howard's End" by gay Latino dramatist Matthew Lopez). Boston theater buffs should expect that premiere to resonate as lyrically as "The Sound Inside."

South Enders Honored at Storybook Ball

SUBMITTED BY MGHFC

The South End's Ronald E. Kleinman, MD, will be honored at MassGeneral Hospital for Children's Storybook Ball during a reimagined virtual evening on Thursday, October 21, at 7:00 p.m.

Dr. Kleinman is stepping down as Physician-in-Chief of MGHFC after 43 years of outstanding service to the hospital. Throughout his storied career, Dr. Kleinman has impacted countless patients, families and fellow clinicians.

His wife, Martha Kleinman, will be spotlighted as Honorary Co-Chair, recognizing her dedication to the Storybook Ball committee for over two decades.

Since the event's inception in 2000, Storybook Ball has raised more than $32 million, allowing MGHFC to provide extraordinary care to its patients and families; to recruit and support the best physicians; and to advance research that will transform clinical care worldwide.

Led by Co-Chairs Fiona and James Benenson of Brookline and Rachel and Bill Motley of Dover, the 22nd anniversary of Storybook Ball includes speeches, patient stories and tributes.

The event showcases the Pediatric Infectious Disease program at MGHFC, which includes a highly expert group of infectious disease clinicians, researchers, microbiologists and pathologists who provide multidisciplinary

Mount Vernon

Residents say they have long co-existed, happily even, with the lodging house, which Mount Vernon bought about seven years ago. In 2018, one resident said, she even rented some rooms there for out-of-town guests coming to celebrate her daughter's graduation from Boston Latin School. Other residents talked of sitting on their stoops - a popular Concord Square pastime in nice weather - and chatting with people staying there.

But residents said that Mount Vernon no longer runs the lodging house in its traditional fashion as a place for young professionals to stay for a month or two after getting a job in Boston and that, especially since the pandemic, it now runs it as an Airbnb, catering to people looking for very short stays, a fair number of them "shady characters" who are into drug use or sales, which, they say, threatens to turn the block of brownstones into an extension of Mass and Cass. Lodging houses are exempt from the city's ban on investor-owned short-term rentals.

One resident spoke of people "staggering out of there stoned out of their minds or otherwise somehow impaired."

Another resident, who lives right next to the lodging house, says he now regularly finds broken glass and cigarette butts in his yard after nights of "screaming and yelling," that he and his wife have to keep their windows shut to keep out the cigarette and marijuana smoke wafting from the building and that he now has concerns just "taking my kids out there after the dark to hang out in our yard" - and when he goes on business trips.

"It's the first time I've felt uncomfortable in the South End," he said.

Another resident said she was sitting on her stoop with her four-year-old son last month, just enjoying a nice day, when a woman pulled up and started "pulling a lot of stuff out of a car." The woman saw her and yelled "What the hell are you looking at?"

"We don't expect suburban Pollyanna whatever," but neither is Concord Square an extension of Mass and Cass, another resident said.

"This is the very first time in 25 years that we've ever seen this level of disjointed operations in a lodging house," Stephen Fox, chairman of the South End Forum, which represents neighborhood groups across the South End, said. "There's something fundamentally wrong with this particular location," he said, adding that might be because it's no longer run as a lodging house but as "a night to night hotel."

Perceley acknowledged that Mount Vernon, like other companies with rooms to let, dramatically lowered rates last year just to try to bring in some revenue during the pandemic. "We lived through something in the pandemic that was brutal," he said. The company, which also owns the Revolution Hotel on Berkeley Street, was "getting crushed."

"I can hear the anger in your voice," he continued. "If you knew us better you'd know we don't play games. This fortunately is somewhat of a foreign experience for us."

"We're not mind readers," he said, and residents need to contact him or Mount Vernon to discuss the issues. "We need to know there's a problem," he said.

Residents retorted that maybe if Mount Vernon, which does not have a full-time staffer at the lodging house, had done what they did and installed cameras on their property, they would know what the problems are.

Licensing Board Chairwoman Kathleen Joyce tried to end the hearing on a positive note. "It sounds like we have a very active community here and an operator who takes pride in his reputation and his job," she said, urging the two sides to keep talking.

Roger Wellington Named Pine Street Inn's Senior Director of Diversity, Equity, Inclusion

SUBMITTED BY PINE STREET INN.

Roger Wellington has been appointed to Pine Street Inn's newly created position of Senior Director of Diversity, Equity and Inclusion, where he will oversee the organization's strategy, policy and practice around DEI efforts.

Roger has been with Pine Street for over 30 years, most currently as Director of the organization's iCaterBoston social enterprise.

"I am honored to be the first person to take on this critical role, and pleased that Pine Street's leadership and board are investing in the organization's DEI initiative - it's the right thing to do and the right time to do it. This is an exciting opportunity, not just for myself but for all of my peers, our guests and our community at large. I look forward to implementing initiatives that will benefit everyone connected with Pine Street and beyond."

must share Laufer's fondness as her staging of the latter's Hub premiere makes Bari and Mike's unexpected connection and evolving romance a winning company opener.

Initially making that connection and developing that romance look to be Herculean labors for the unlikely couple. Bari sees no serenity in yoga with her fulfillment center co-workers Luanne and Patty, calls herself an atheist, despairs of "hard economic times," refers to Schopenhauer and speaks of everything ending in grief.

At the same time the non-tenured teacher believes that "nothing matters" and struggles to write her dissertation on nihilism for eight years with no success. Complicating her life even further are collapses that may be seizures.

All of these challenges notwithstanding, her thinking and philosophy of life begin to change after she is paired up by Patty with her cousin Mike. At first, Bari jumps to the erroneous conclusion that Mike is a "loser" when he picks up a stroller and a wicker basket that have been abandoned.

In reality Mike is a MacArthur Foundation grant recipient, regarded as a genius for transforming discards into unusual residences—with one actually bought for $10,000 and installed in a museum. Adding to the distinctiveness of Mike's construction of nearly 300 houses is the help of his pet crow Hubbel—who brings over wood (a demonstration of the intelligence of the bird).

Bari's seizures may continue, but rectangles of light—much in blue and red—attend her relationship with Mike. "We're connected," she admits. As they kiss and become more intimate, her nihilistic philosophy fades and she realizes that he is an essentially nice guy.

Eventually he reveals a disturbing truth about what happened to his late wife and child, but Bari understands that he is trying to hold things together. Ultimately, her new understanding about Mike, love and what is important in life brings her to an appreciation of what human fulfillment can be.

Under O'Connor's sharp direction, Samantha Richert captures the inspiring character arc that takes Bari from despair to hope and self-esteem. Her seizures are fully convincing, as is her elation over visions of color and connection with Mike.

Barlow Adamson finds all of Mike's likeable eccentricity and his touching self-searching. Shani Farrell has Patti's tough love and caring. Katherine C. Shaver is properly naïve and supportive. Kudos go to Janie E. Howland's well detailed fulfillment center and Karen Perlow's poetic color visions.

Director O'Connor observes in her playbill note how this story and Bari resonate with her own life. "Be Here Now" may seem a "small" play to some demanding theatergoers, but Bari and Mike's respective journeys to real existence should ring true—especially with the rise of anxiety and depression in the age of COVID-19.
