MJ tells some of the story

BY JULES BECKER

It should come as no surprise that a jukebox show dedicated to the music and dance of the King of Pop includes as many as 41 numbers from his amazing repertoire. After all, Michael Joseph Jackson rightly earned a slew of Grammy Awards and other prizes for his efforts and even entry to the Dance Hall of Fame—the only recording artist to be inducted. "MJ" (2021), a four Tony Award-winning musical (2022)—for lead male acting, choreography, lighting and sound—pays exciting tribute to Jackson's unique music and dance innovations—now with an electrifying lead performance by

Is the American Dream an impossibility for most Americans? Is class a major factor? Clearly F. Scott Fitzgerald was exploring these disturbing questions with a kind of prophetic vision in his 1925 masterwork "The Great Gatsby." Now "Gatsby"—an American Repertory Theatre musical adaptation of the novel with music by Florence Welch and Thomas Bartlett, lyrics by the former and book by Martyna Majok—is bringing timely attention to its prescient insights.

A.R.T.'s visually stunning world premiere staging may need some tweaking in capturing the tragedy of its enigmatic title character, but a truly great cast sings and dances with the kind of Jazz Age intensity that Fitzgerald would admire.

"Gatsby"'s gifted design team brings North Shore Long Island's Jazz Age to dazzling life right from the start. Scenic designer Mimi Lien captures the burgeoning business and industry of Long Island and

BPRC: Boston Reparations Task Force Appointee Raises Troubling Questions

By BPRC

The Boston People's Reparations Commission (BPRC) has questioned the appointment of former Massachusetts House of Representative Byron Rushing to Boston Mayor Michele Wu's Boston Reparations Task Force. Rushing has been tapped to serve as senior advisor to the city group.

The BPRC's concerns are based on a February 1, 2024 WGBH podcast series. The host of the "What Is Owed?" The series podcast quotes Byron Rushing as stating his decision to support the late Senator Bill Owens reparations proposal in the 1980's was "the worst decision of his political career." This comment can be found at the 27:00 mark from Episode 2 - "Bill Owens: Boston's Reparations Trailblazer" at this link:

<https://www.npr.org/podcasts/1228214509/what-is-owed>

Edwin Sumpter, Co-Director of the Boston People's Reparation Commission said that "Rushing's comment indicates bias and sends mixed signals to those hoping for a realistic opportunity for reparations in Boston."

"I do not understand how someone could advise the reparations task force after making negative comments on the issue of reparations. I feel Mayor Wu or the head of the Boston Reparation Task Force owes Black Boston an explanation." Sumpter added.

The Boston People's Reparations Commission, an independent, grassroots effort, was formed in 2023 and has actively engaged Boston's African American community around the subject of reparations. Along with monthly meetings, BPRC recently hosted a day of public testimonies in support of reparations which was attended by hundreds in Roxbury and viewed by millions online.

"I was so incredibly impressed with the care and dedication of every single person I met." Lauren Cook, CEO of Ellis Early Learning, told the audience, "I just can't thank (her) enough for highlighting our work and for your support and making this possible."

MJ

Roman Banks in the strong tour at the Citizens Opera House.

While the unsatisfying book by gifted playwright Lynn Nottage (“Ruined”) avoids the controversy that surrounded Jackson from 1993 until his 2009 passing, the choreography by Christopher Wheeldon—a talent familiar to Boston Ballet buffs and a double threat here as director—has thrillingly captured the heart and soul of Jackson’s genius as composer and performer.

That thrill informs “MJ” right from the start as manager Rob warms up dancers—two days prior to Jackson’s 1992 Dangerous World Tour—at an industrial rehearsal studio—strikingly designed by Derek McClane. Soon enough dynamic Banks enters, and a riveting “Beat It” follows—rightly cheered opening night by a very enthusiastic audience.

Throughout the two act musical, Banks and the tour’s impassioned ensemble bring crack synchronization and sharp technique to many Jackson gems—especially “Don’t Stop Til You Get Enough” and “Wanna Be Startin’ Somethin’.”

Banks fully executes the Jackson trademark moonwalk and robot moves, and audience members rightly responded with extended applause. His robust vocals capture Jackson’s remarkable feeling—especially on “Human Nature” and “Man in the Mirror.” Bane Griffith (alternating with Josiah Benson) has all of Little Michael’s energy, and Brandon Lee Harris capture’s Michael’s evolving inspiration as a soloist and composer.

Enriching number after number are Victor Simonson’s vibrant musical direction, Paul Tazewell’s well-detailed costumes (particularly Jackson’s stylish jackets), Natasha Katz’s fiery lighting (especially for “Thriller”) and Gareth Owen’s nuanced sound design.

Where more nuance and insight are needed is in Nottage’s informative but relatively undramatic text. Part of the problem here is an ongoing plot element involving a fictional interviewer named Rachel and her photographer Alejandro. There are unsurprising details about abusive father Joseph Jackson and devout Jehovah’s Witness mother Katherine as well as the ultimately problematic prescription of painkillers after Michael suffered serious burns at the time of a Pepsi ad. Better moments center on such dance muses as Fred Astaire, Bob Fosse and the Nicholas Brothers. Motown’s Berry Gordy and multi-talent Quincy Jones are justly treated as major influences. Apparently the Michael Jackson Estate influenced the cut-off of the time of the musical before the cases involving charges of sexual abuse—cases for which no evidence was found. Also missing is Dr. Conrad Murray, convicted of involuntary manslaughter for overdosing Jackson with propofol.

Even so, Banks and his fellow talented actors and dancers do provide considerable compensation. Versatile Devin Bowles catches manager Rob’s hard-driving approach and father Joseph Jackson’s disturbing controlling. Anastasia Talley is properly harried and vulnerable as Katherine. Mary Kate Moore does her best with the role of the self-serving and often annoyingly persistent Rachel.

Jackson seems to agonize at times over the price of fame. With a stronger book, his complex internal war could have made “MJ” a great musical. As is, it more than keeps the faith with Banks’ transcendent dance. You can really feel it.

Gatsby

New York City with high concept metal constructs. The shimmering stage left streamers match costume designer Sandy Powell's flapper and stylish evening wear for the guests at Gatsby's West Egg parties. Alan C. Edwards' smart lighting brings neon beauty to the art deco skyscraper backdrop.

At the same time Lien nails the novel's "valley of ashes" imagery and sharply brings contrasting sparseness to mechanic George Wilson's garage and George and wife Myrtle's simple residence. Throughout the two-act musical, director Rachel Chavkin smoothly moves between the upscale and working class sets and situations.

Now that the novel resides in the public domain, Majok's sensitivity to the working class—as seen in her Pulitzer Prize-winning play "Cost of Living"—may help to explain why the Wilsons seem to have extra attention and musical expression in "Gatsby." Of course the conflict between nouveau riche Jay Gatsby and old money Tom Buchanan gets its due. Gatsby's ongoing pursuit of his earlier love Daisy—now a Buchanan—and Tom's brazen affair with Myrtle are also clearly stated.

Narrating bond salesman Nick Carroway does gradually provide insight about bootlegging millionaire Gatsby and as in the novel serves as a kind of go-between for Gatsby and Daisy. Majok has sexually ambivalent Nick respond to advances from a male partygoer with a reciprocated kiss—a response alluded to in the novel. The generally strong book could do with inclusion of the novel's back story detail about the influence of predatory miner and mentor Dan Cody.

Chavkin's cast is first-rate. Isaac Powell has all of Gatsby's elusiveness and outsider demeanor at his parties and in diverse encounters. Charlotte MacInnes catches Daisy's vulnerability and insecurity. Powell and MacInnes have persuasive romantic moments. Cory Jeacom finds all of Tom's arrogance and dangerous insincerity. MacInnes and Jeacom catch fire with their characters' accusations in "The Damage That You Do." Ben Livi Ross moves convincingly from relative cluelessness to growing insightfulness as Carroway. Eleri Ward has trophy-winning golfer Jordan Baker's distant demeanor with Nick and strong caring for close friend Daisy.

Full plotting about West Egg Gatsby, the East Egg Buchanans and emotionally conflicted Carroway notwithstanding, some of the strongest moments go to the Wilsons and their respective challenges—George's work frustrations and Myrtle's need to escape an unsatisfying marriage. Majok has intriguingly inserted a back story factor in which their daughter has died after failing to receive treatment for the flu. Matthew Amira possesses aching despair as Wilson. Solea Pfeiffer has remarkable tenacity as Myrtle—especially in the impassioned "What of Love, What of God."

Adam Grupper, rivetingly savvy as Gatsby's Jewish bootlegging mentor Wolfsheim (based on crime kingpin Arnold Rothstein, reputed to have fixed the 1919 World Series), has the musical's unquestionable showstopper "Feels Like Hell." Here Grupper combines arresting soft-shoe and vocal ferocity. Gifted choreographer Sonya Tayeh (Tony Award for "Moulin Rouge") captures the vivacity of the Jazz Age here and in all of the finely synchronized dance ensembles.

When Fitzgerald died (1940), he believed himself a failure and thought his work would be forgotten. Time has of course proven his self-judgment wrong. Likewise "Gatsby," tweaking aside, endorses Fitzgerald's cautionary look at the American Dream in a timely musical that deserves to endure.
